	Approved For Release 2004/03/26 CIA-RDP80M01082A000700210922-2
25X1	DCI/IC 74-010
	11 January 1974
	MEMORANDUM FOR THE RECORD
	SUBJECT: Meeting with Jim Critchfield on the Relationship between the Intelligence Community and the Private Economic Sector 1 and I met with Critchfield on 12 December to get his views on the subject. Critchfield was bearish on the general concept of attempting to formalize or institutionalize the dissemination X1	of economic intelligence to the private sector.
	ì
	2. At least by implication, Critchfield indicated that more
L	structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more diffi-
L	structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current
L	structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity,
	structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly
	structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly adjusted to changing conditions and circumstances.  DCI/IC/JHL: is structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly adjusted to changing conditions and circumstances.  DCI/IC/JHL: is Distribution:  Orig Gen. Grapan structured arrangements with national business and trade associations, for example, would be simultaneously inflexible and much more difficult to control. The risk of both political and security flaps would consequently be considerably greater. The great advantage of current arrangements, according to Critchfield, was that their scope, intensity, and substance were under the DCI's control and could be rapidly adjusted to changing conditions and circumstances.  DCI/IC/JHL: is Distribution: